Most Android home screens are made up of app shortcuts, with maybe a couple widgets thrown in for good measure. Placing an app shortcut on the home screen is just a matter of long pressing on its icon in the app drawer, but what if you want to create a shortcut to a specific file like an MP3, document or video? MORE: Android 6.0 Marshmallow Guide: Tips, Tricks and How-Tos While this isn't built into the operating system, a quick trip to Google Play will have you creating shortcuts to any file or folder on your phone with just a few taps of your screen. Here's how to do it in the latest version of Android.

1. Download and install ES File Explorer File Manager. There are other file managers that will allow you to create file shortcuts, but for this tip, we'll use ES File Explorer File Manager for its simplicity and clean interface.
2. Open ES File Explorer File Manager.
3. Navigate to the file, files or folder that you wish to create a shortcut for. You can navigate to the files using the Category menu on the homescreen of ES File Explorer File Manager. Or if you know the file you are looking for is in the Download folder you may want to navigate there by tapping the icon in the upper-left corner of the app and selecting Download.
4. Long press on the file that you want to select. A checkbox will appear on the file's icon and menu options at the top of the screen will change.
5. Tap the overflow icon (three vertical dots) in the upper-right corner.
6. Select Add to Desktop. There's no message to indicate that the shortcut has been created, but if you exit the app you will see the new shortcut pop up in the first available space on your homescreen. You can now drag and drop the shortcut wherever you like on your homescreen, just as with any other app or widget. Be aware that you aren't able to create shortcuts to specific image files, but you can create a shortcut to a folder with as few or as many images as you like in it. Many email servers refuse to accept email attachments over a certain size. While attachment sizes haven't kept up with the times, there are other easy ways to send someone large files over email. Even if you're using a modern, online email client, message size is limited. Gmail, for example, allows messages to be up to 25 MB, including the message's text and any attachments. Outlook.com allows only 10 MB. When sending messages over these services, they will automatically give you a helping hand and suggest alternatives—such as using Google Drive for Gmail attachments and OneDrive for Outlook.com. That's handy, of course, but if you're using a desktop email client or another service, you may need to know about these tricks yourself. What's the Maximum Size of an Email Attachment? In theory, there's no limit to the amount of data you can attach to an email. Email standards don't specify any sort of size limit. In practice, most email servers—and some email clients—enforce their own size limits. In general, when attaching files to an email, you can be reasonably sure that up to 10MB of attachments are okay. Some email servers may have smaller limits, but 10MB is generally the standard. Gmail allows you to attach up to 25MB to a single email, but this is only guaranteed to work if you're emailing other Gmail users. As soon as the email leaves Gmail's servers, it could be rejected by another email server. Many servers are configured to not accept more than 10MB of attachments. RELATED: How Does Email Work? It's not even as simple as looking at the maximum attachment size of the service you use and the service you're emailing—emails often travel over several mail transfer agents when they're sent, so you may have your attachment rejected by a server along the way if you attach too much data. You should also bear in mind that email attachments are generally MIME encoded, which increases their size by about 33%. So 10MB of files on your disk will become about 13MB of data when attached to an email. Use a Cloud Storage Service By far, your simplest option is to store files you want to share on a cloud storage service like Dropbox, Google Drive, or OneDrive. You can then share the file with someone and inform them via email that you have done so. They can then click a link and download the file directly to their computer. If you use Gmail or Outlook.com, you'll find that Google and Microsoft have integrated Google Drive and OneDrive into their respective email services. Just click the Google Drive or SkyDrive button when sending an email and you'll be able to share a file via email. Gmail and Outlook will walk you through choosing a file that already exists in your cloud storage drive or uploading a new file. If you use something like Dropbox, you can share the file from the cloud storage service's website. For example, right-click a file on Dropbox's website and select Share link if you use Dropbox. If you have the Dropbox app installed on your computer, you can also right-click any file in your Dropbox folder and you'll see a "Share" command there, as well. This is the option many email providers are pushing us towards—if you try to attach a large file in Gmail or Outlook.com, you'll be prompted to upload it to Google Drive or SkyDrive first. Create and Send Multi-Part Archives RELATED: How to Upload Really Large Files to SkyDrive, Dropbox, or Email If you're looking for a more traditional, do-it-yourself method, you can split your file up into smaller parts. For example, if you had a 50MB file you wanted to email—or even a collection of large files—you could use a file compression program like 7-Zip to create an archive, and then split the archive into five 10MB pieces. After splitting the archive, you can then attach all the separated pieces to separate emails. The recipient will need to download each attachment, and then use a file extraction program to extract the larger, complete file from the separate archives. While it can be a bit cumbersome, this traditional method still works as well as it always did. Some recipients might be confused by the separate attachments—or at least won't enjoy jumping through hoops to reassemble them. If you're not sure whether your recipient will know how to do this, it's probably better to choose an easier method. Use a Large-File Sending Service To help answer the large attachment problems, a number of file-sending services have sprung up online over the years. These services let you upload a file, and then give you a link to your upload. You can then paste that link into an email and the recipient can click the link and download the file. RELATED: The Best Free Programs and Online Services for Sending and Sharing Large Files Of course, these services have to make money somehow. They may do that by displaying ads, limiting the maximum file size available to free users, or demanding a subscription fee. We've covered many of these online services for sending and sharing large files before. And note that when you use an online service, you're entrusting it with your files. That may be okay if your files aren't particularly sensitive, but you'll probably want to shy away from uploading sensitive data to a free service you haven't heard of before. Of course, you could encrypt the files before uploading them—but that would add additional hassle for the recipient, too. These file-sending services work fine, so long as you're okay with whatever ads or limitations exist, and you understand the risks—especially with sensitive files. However, we typically recommend just using a cloud storage service instead. Transferring files between Android phones via Bluetooth needs to be buried in the past. The Wi-Fi direct method, used by the majority of inter-phone file sharing apps, should become the new standard. This won't happen until manufacturers start building it as a stock software feature inside their products. Until then, though, feel free to use apps such as CShare to get by your file-sharing needs at speed 10 times as fast as 3G, and 30 times as fast as Bluetooth. CShare has pretty colors, is fast, and very easy to install and use. We'd say it covers the three most important app bases pretty well! So, here's how you use it to send and receive files. It goes without saying that this type of sharing goes on between devices in reasonably close proximity - around 328ft (100m). For long-distance sharing, use cloud storage. First, get CShare from the Google Play Store on your phone or tablet (link). It's totally free. Open the app, and it should immediately recognize your device's brand and model name. Next, hit Send. You'll be greeted by a file browser where you mark the designated files (it can apps, pictures, video, music) and hit "Select" when you're finished. Now, here comes the only tedious part - getting the recipient to install CShare. It actually happens pretty fast, but if your recipient isn't an avid smartphone user, it might take a bit of direction to get them on the right track. Anyway, you have a number of ways to proceed. The first is to get the recipient to read a QR Code and download the app. The others send a URL or SMS containing the download, and the final, possibly most sensible option is to send the app to your recipient via Bluetooth. When CShare is up and running on both sides, it's time to press the Receive button on the receiving end. If everything goes as well, the selected file(s) gets magically beamed to the recipient phone with a cool animation and a tiny speed report so you can brag later. Like a properly polished app, CShare has a file transfer history, so you'll know where to find your files. And that's it! Share easy, share free. Android (4.0+)
Web: PushBullet is a webapp and companion Android app that makes it simple to get files, documents, addresses, lists, and plain text—just about anything you want—from your desktop into your Android phone's notifications pane. From there, you can open it directly in any application you choose. There are plenty of ways to get files from your computer to your Android phone—you can email it to yourself, put the file in Dropbox and then open it on your phone, use Google Drive for documents—but none of those methods makes it as easy as PushBullet does. PushBullet's greatest strength is that anything you push goes right into your notifications pane where you can work with it instantly—you don't need to open another app, sync, or download what you sent yourself. When you push a file, a note, an address, or a list to your phone, PushBullet drops it into the notifications pane. Just tap the item in the notifications list and you'll be prompted to open it in the right application. If you push an address, you can choose Maps. If you push a document, you can choose whatever document reader you have installed. If it's a list, you can use Android's rich notifications to browse it and leave it in the notifications (like a shopping list, for example, only in your notifications bar) or open it in another app. The app is brand new, so expect a few quirks here and there. It's also free, and requires you download the Android app and select a Google account to pair the webapp and the Android app after installing. We tested it, and it works as advertised. It may not totally replace the old Dropbox trick, but it's a great way to get addresses and APKs right to your phone so you can use them immediately.
